One of the latest trends in the ergonomics is the use of exercise balls to replace the traditional office chair. Is that a good idea? What does work ecology say? To find out i've read the reports you know that sitting all day is bad for you so when a friend tells you about a possible interesting solution to this problem, you are intrigued. The advice your friend gave you is to replace your desk chair with an exercise ball. In this way, they claim, you can get a little extra exercise and develop a better posture at the same time. Sounds great, doesn't it? Well, not so fast... Using exercise balls as office chairs seem to take off as another strategy aimed at reducing fatigue, discomfort and sitting disease, but is it really effective? What do work environment experts say? To discover that the idea behind using an exercise ball instead of a desk chair the idea of sitting on a ball exercise instead of a traditional office chair is that instability in ball exercise requires the user to further energize the trunk muscles and thus increase the core strength, improve posture and reduce discomfort. Another benefit of ball chair supporters claim is increased calorie burning. When the kernel is involved, they say, the user burns more calories than he sits in a traditional office chair. So, are these benefits the real deal? Is it smart to replace your desk chair with an exercise ball? Let's take a look at the scientific evidence. A look at the scientific evidence behind the exercise of balls as virtually office chairs all search points for practicing balls cause more problems than solutions, and most experts recommend sticking to the traditional (engineerly correct) office chair. One study found that prolonged sitting on a stability ball does not significantly change the way an individual sits, yet it seems to increase the level of discomfort. Another study found that, there was no difference in muscle activation features of both 14 muscles between sitting on the stool and the ball. The calculated stability and pressure values showed sitting on the ball did not make a difference in the average response values. The contact area of the user's seat interface was the biggest on the exercise ball. According to the Center for Research Experience for the Prevention of Musculoskeletal Disorders, the use of stability balls as a chair may actually increase the risk of low back discomfort and may increase the risk of injury due to the unstable nature of the balls. Bottom line: You should leave exercise balls to... Exercise! Don't sit at your desk all day and use it for small periods of time as part of your fitness and exercise plan. The best solution is to choose a comfortable office chair, consider the stand-seating workstation, take stretch breaks throughout the day, and go for a short walk to get blood flow.
